Margaritas & Donuts

About the Show

Margaritas & Donuts is a fiction podcast about black love after 40.

It is the second podcast series from Observer Pictures, an independent short film and podcast production company based in Nashville, Tenn. founded by Faith McQuinn.

Josephine is a successful pediatrician working in Nashville. And she's pretty unlucky romantically. With a little coaxing from her best friend Katrina, Josephine starts a relationship with Malik, an ophthalmologist that works in the office across the hall from hers. Malik is exactly what Josephine needs, but she doesn't quite realize it...yet.

Margaritas & Donuts is a limited series and should be listened to from the beginning. All six episodes, plus a bonus stand-alone quarantine episode, are available now. A transcript for the super cut and the bonus episode are available at observerpictures.com/MDEisodes.html.

Faith McQuinn
writer/director

Faith has been a writer and video editor for since 2005. She spent nine years teaching film production and screenwriting at the college level. After years of helping other people bring their stories to life, she decided to start Observer Pictures with the intent of making a new project every year. To date, she's produced four short films and two fiction podcasts.

Amanda Lorraine
producer/assistant director

Amanda has been intrigued with storytelling ever since her mom and Nanny introduced her to "stories" (aka soap operas). Through college and after, she's been on the producing team for multiple short films. She met Faith in college where their teacher-student relationship transformed into a creative duo when she joined Observer Pictures.

"This podcast has been a pleasant surprise to me already. It has strong female leads while also not walking all over masculine characters. Instead it seems to celebrate the qualities of good men while letting woman be on equal footing. Another treat was the diversity in casting. As an African American it's nice to see. This company produces great things."
